

SOCIOLÓGIA publishes original papers written by sociologists in Slovakia and abroad, sociological essays from our social, political and cultural life. It presents information about sociological publication, activities in social sciences, international conferences and sociological congresses. It pays special attention to the problems of civic society, to communities, of cities and villages, to the sociological problems of enterprises and work, to the problems of family, youth, social structure and pathological phenomena. Papers from the history of sociology, from theory and methodology, findings of sociological research and surveys of public opinion are also published. The journal is not only for sociologists, but also for the broader public, for university and middle_level school students, teachers, cultural and educational workers, activists of political parties and civic unions, and for all those who want to know more about our society. SOCIOLÓGIA is published by the Institute of Sociology of the Slovak Academy of Sciences in SAP, Bratislava. It is published in Slovak (4 issues per annum) and in English (2 issues per annum). Slovak issues include English summaries.
